JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

[From the Little Pioneer.] A Riddle. I can leap, and I can run, And yet I never walk; I speak to you without a tongue, And without words I talk. I am stronger than the strongest man, No chain can fetter me; And yet so weak, that with a blow A child can make me flee. I am white, and green, and blue, by turns, And often change my hue; And oft I wear a robe so clear, All eyes can see me through. [From the Little Pioneer.]

The Hidden Jewel; or Love overcometh all

Two children were playing among the ruins of an old town in Germany. Among the heaps of rubbish that lay piled up on the shore, they discovered a stone, on which were written these words:

" Bidden, deep within me lies, A jewel, bright to mortal eyes; He who would this prize obtain, Must strive aright, or strive in vain. Other means in vain you try-I your strongest power dely. But if right-you are sure to win The precious gem that lies within.

The children saw the inscription, and, as they thought it must mean something which they did not understand, they took it home to their father, who was a jeweler. "What is this?" said he. "I have seen gold imbedded in quartz, but never in a rough rock of granite like this. But, if it is here, I will soon find it out." With that, he went to work, hammering and chiseling, but he could not make a mark upon the Bell stone, even with his tools of strongest steel. "Certes!" said he; "this stone is bewitched. Furniture, cs ... It must have been left among those old ruins by some gnome or fairy, who alone has the key to its treasures. It is not for me to open it;" and he cast it away into the street. "What is this ?" said a smith, as he was trud ing along, and saw the stone, and read the inscri written upon it. "A jewel! and hidden to in stone like this! Ha! ha! ha! who ever heard

" However, we cannot always tell the jewel the casket, and, as all is not gold that glitters, that which does not glitter may sometimes be gol I will try and see what I can do with it."

So he took it home, and cast it into his furnac and watched it to see it melt away before the glo ing heat. But, day after day, there it lay, the fi did not make it warm, or raise a single flaw on i surface.

"Lackaday !" said he ; " this stone beats : the stones that ever I heard of. Here I have roas ed it now, in that hot furnace, for more than week, and the fire, instead of cracking it, and Beef, bbls... showing to me the jewel, does not even make it Bread, cks So! So! There's one more fool added to Casks, gails. the list." And he cast the stone outside of his smithy.

A miller found it next, and read the lines. " Can't be opened, hey !" said he. " Well, we will see. Let me but get it between the two stones | Beef, bbls .. of my mill, and hang me, for a dog, if it is not crushed to atoms in less than a minute, and out flies the jewel."

But the millstones had as little effect on it as the chisel and the fire. "Bless me !" said the miller. "I have heard of diamonds, that no stone could grind except a diamond, but I never before heard before of a stone like this. The third fool is greater than the second. I will have no more to do with Beef, bbls it." And he too threw it into the street. A poor, humble fisherman, named Heinrich, saw it, as he was going home with his son, late one night, from fishing. He read the inscription, and said to his son, "Carl, let us take this stone home-There is a meaning in these words that few under. stand. 'Tis true it could not be opened by all the chiseling, the burning, and the grinding, but still, I verily believe there is a way in which this jewel may be obtained. The one who wrote the inscription, if we can but find him can tell us the way.'

They took the stone home, and laid it away and Heinrich went singing about the house, busy with his evening's work, while Carl sat in the chimneycorner, making nets, and happy as a lord. " Heigho!" said he. " I feel amazing jolly tonight. Fear not, father !- we have found the stone, and we will soon have the jewel. Something tells me we shall find it this night." And Carl struck up and sung :-

46 Merrily, merrily let us live, And take the blessings God doth give. A thankful heart is a priceless thing, And a singing beggar is rich as a king; And a loving heart is the heart for me, And a brave, high soul, that is strong and free. Merrily, merrily let us live, And take the blessings God doth give."

Suddenly, a loud knocking was heard at the door and Heinrich opened it, and a stranger stood before it. "I have travelled far," said he; "'tis night, and I am weary with my journey. May I come " Come in;" said the fisherman. " Carl, throw a faggot on the fire, while I hasten and prepare this stranger his supper. 'Tis little that we have, it is true; but such as it is, he is welcome to it as though he were a king. He shall sleep in thine own bed, Carl, and I will give thee part of mine." The stranger sat at the table to eat his supper that Heinrich had provided, and the stone, with the strange inscription, was before him. " Friend," said he to the fisherman, " whence didst thou obtain this stone?" "It came to me," said Heinrich, " without my asking. This stone contains a jewel. Many have tried to open it, and bring it forth to the light, but have not been able. Canst thou tell us the se-

"I can," said the stranger; and taking from his pocket a little key, he applied it to the stone, and in an instant it flew open, and the jewel dropped out. Heinrich and his son sprang forward to seize it, exclaiming: "We have found it! we have found it! Now are we rich indeed !"

And so they were, for it was a pearl of great

They turned and looked for the stranger, and he From schooner "Jenny Ford!" was gone.

But the key he had left behind him, and on it were written these words :-" Love overcometh all things,"

VELOCITY OF ELECTRICITY.-The velocity is so great that the most rapid motion which can be produced by art appears to be actual rest when compared with it. A wheel revolving with celerity sufficient to render its spokes invisible, when illuminated by a flash of lightning, is seen for an instant, with all its spokes distinct, as if it were in a state of absolute repose; because, however rapid the rotation may be, the light has come and already ceased before the wheel has had time to turn through a sensible space.

This remarkable experiment is due to Professor Wheatstone, as well as the following variation of it, which is not less striking. Since a sunbeam III CREAMS! III CREAMS! consists of a mixture of blue, yellow and red light, if a circular piece of pasteboard is divided into three sections, one of which is painted blue, another yellow, and a third red, it will appear to be white when revolving quickly, because of the rapidity with which the impressions of the colors succeed each other on the retina. But the instant it is illumined by an electric spark it seems to it is illumined by an electric spark it seems to stand still, and each color is as distinct as if it were at rest. This transcendent speed of the electric fluid has been ingeniously measured by Professor Wheatstone, who has ascertained that it much surpasses that of light.
